How to answer “Tell me about yourself”

Tell me about yourself

When they ask “tell me about yourself”, your answer should be short, concise, and well-structured. In no longer than 2 to 3 minutes, touch upon your key personal, work, and academic experiences, extracurriculars, accomplishments, and career goals. Don’t spend too much time on any one of the above listed topics – you’ll get a chance with later questions to expand on the specifics. Most importantly, don’t just give a dry, facts-based summary of yourself, similar to your resume. This is not a recitation of your CV! The admissions committee will be interviewing many candidates, and you need to stand out from the crowd. Try to highlight interesting facts such as an off-beat hobby, an important personal detail, etc. Also, try to touch upon why an MBA is important to you and what fuels your passion for business.

What are your strengths and weaknesses?

You can use this question to highlight characteristics or qualities about yourself that need improvement, or to explain major gaps in your resume, a low GPA in an MBA application or poor test scores. You can also take responsibility for any setbacks and failures you have faced in the past or are currently facing. For instance, if you are applying for an MBA while unemployed. Do not play victim to circumstances! Be sincere and don’t try to provide clever answers such as “my weakness is I’m too hardworking” – interviewers will instantly see through such tactics and mark you down for them. By honestly evaluating your weaknesses, and describing how they balance against your strengths, you can showcase how well-rounded you are as a candidate and that you can learn from your mistakes. When explaining your weaknesses, remember to talk about how you have addressed them in the past, and how you will continue to work on them. When talking about your strengths, don't be modest, but at the same time back up each point with examples that showcase your strengths.

Tell me about a time you failed.

Choose the incident wisely. On the one hand, it shouldn't be a pseudo-failure where you didn't really fail, as interviewers will note that you evaded the question and will conclude that you can't honestly talk about your mistakes. On the other hand, the incident shouldn't raise any major red flags – for example, no one will want a candidate who admits to criminal activities such as embezzling funds from a company! The incident can be from your business, academic or personal life, as long as your answer highlights how the failure influenced your journey to business school. Remember that this question isn't a chance to air personal grievances or talk about how others have failed you. Remember, take responsibility for any setbacks you experienced! Keep the overall tone positive and avoid painting others in a bad light. Instead, try to show a sense of personal responsibility and a growth mindset.

Why this school/MBA program?

Don't waste time focusing too much on how prestigious the school is or how the program is one of the best in the country. Such answers are obvious and don't say anything about you, and every answer you give should be proving why YOU are the right candidate for this program. Instead, your answer should focus on 2 or 3 practical aspects of their school/MBA program such as the focus of the program, the courses, the school faculty, industry connections, job placements, school culture etc. Connect these to your past experiences and/or career goals to emphasize how you can mutually benefit from your participation in their MBA program. To prepare for this question, make sure you thoroughly research the school, its mission, values, the program curriculum, faculty, and so on.
